KSPS Commander
Jim Johnston

As I write this, squadron commanders around the state and nation, including yours truly, are in a similar process of winding up their command and completing their last version of "Commander's Comments." There is a mixture of thankfulness and regret that accompanies the process; thankfulness that there is still an organization to pass on, and regret that all the objectives imagined at the beginning have not been achieved. It is true that one needs at least two years to get a handle on the job of commander with all its privileges and responsibilities. Fortunately, our intended incoming commander is a veteran of the position, and "can hit the ground running." More on that later.

There is much that makes me thankful for our squadron, beginning with the folks who step up to the call year after year, and do whatever is required of them: they are the muscle and sinew of our organization. But I am also thankful for those who, even though they don't live in our locality anymore, or are not able to attend a meeting or fill a position, still re-up at dues time. Although they cannot actively participate, they help fund the operating needs of KSPS. I have met a few of these folks in the course of my tenure as commander and I am awed by their knowledge, dedication, love of boating, and the extent of their participation during the years they could be active. Good folks, all! So, thanks to all who "could and did", and those who "couldn't but stayed on board anyway."

One objective I have not met as completely as I would have desired is the development of a packet of information each officer passes on to the successor; notes on established procedures, things tried, resources, hints to success, and the like. National has an excellent hand-out for each position that forms the basis for a good beginning, but how the goals are achieved varies with the needs of the local squadron.

No one should have to assume a leadership position in a squadron such as ours, with more than 65 years of history and precedent, without such help. Reaching new heights of accomplishment begins by acknowledging, then standing on the shoulders of a predecessor's achievements. I am ready to offer my help to assist the new commander to develop such materials for future officers. I also extend my sincere thanks to all those who were helpful resources during my tenure these last two years.

Much preparation has gone into our annual Change of Watch meeting at the Beacon Club in January, and certain "inducements" have been added to help budgets already strained by holiday demands. Join us as we select and install our new officers for 2016. Shake her hand and welcome our District Commander, Dawn Flynn, who has traveled from Lansing to be with us. In a sense, this is our squadron's 68th birthday. Who doesn't enjoy a birthday party (as long as it isn't ours)!

Keep doing the good things you that you do!

Check Your Boat's Lights

Checking navigation lights often takes a back seat to other boat projects. Besides, if the lights pass vessel safety check muster by coming on, that's good enough, right? Wrong. Just squeaking by isn't good enough when it comes to keeping you and your boat safe.

Are your vessel lights visible for a mile, as regulations require? As required by Rule 22, is the white light visible for 2 miles (assuming your boat is less than 40 feet)? Has time taken its toll, making the lenses of your lights milky? If your red port sidelight is pink and dim, the answer is yes. Do obstructions on deck interfere with the required light pattern? Perhaps a light is just puny, and although it meets the letter of the law, it doesn't do its job of making you visible to others on the water.

Anyone who has boated at night knows that things look different in the dark. Trying to pick out a vessel's lights against a background of dozens (or even hundreds) of shore lights can be difficult, and a poorly lit boat could easily go unnoticed. If you encounter another vessel in the same situation, the results could be disastrous.

Make sure your lights work, meet regulations and aren't obstructed. If you have to replace them, don't buy the cheapest lights. Do some research, and consider whether an upgrade might be appropriate. Make sure your white light won't blind you or whoever else may be at the helm.

Many manufacturers often position lights so they are directly visible from the helm. If your brand new boat has lights that shine onto the helm or are obscured by deck fittings, make your dealer and the manufacturer aware that the lighting is inadequate and unsafe during reduced visibility conditions and nighttime operations.

One more thing: Learn light patterns and what they mean. You should be able to distinguish the light patterns of a sailboat, powerboat, or a tug with a tow. These light patterns are well defined and documented. In addition to identifying the vessel type, light patterns also allow other boaters to determine the vessel's direction of travel and whether it is at anchor. In some instances, the light pattern will tell you what maneuver the vessel is performing.
